

The Birmingham-Jefferson History Museum is getting close to keeping its promise of opening this spring. We first mentioned the effort's new home last summer once we'd figured out that the murals that had been in the Lyric Theater had been moved to the museum's soon to be temporary space.

We shared some photos that took a closer look at the unfinished work of art that will no doubt play a prominent role in the early days of the facility in this site's Gallery back in June. We're using one of those images here in this piece as well.

Laura Kate at Magic City Manifesto recently stumbled across the museum's hopefully temporary home over at the Center for Regional Planning and Architecture (a.k.a that building on 18th Street and 1st Avenue North) and found out that it is indeed planning to open in late April (the 29th to be exact).

Hopefully folks will learn more about additional plans in the coming weeks.

Photo: Bob Farley/f8Photo