

Today I'm starting to test the waters virtually to determine whether or not we'll open our own office later this summer. The space would double as a coworking community for some of the city's creatives and a physical home for us to host events related to content on the site.

There's a new section in the process of being built out that currently has a post explaining what's on my mind (at least, the first of many that will explain) as well as a survey that will help us determine if we can responsibly move forward with the process. The new section will also be used this spring and summer to help folks get a better understanding about just what coworking is and take a look at some of the other coworking communities taking shape in Birmingham.

The hope for the short term is that those of you that are freelancers and solopreneurs (and potential sponsors) will consider filling out the survey and passing the link on to as many people as possible.

We'll keep you updated on what's going on.
