

Folks driving along Clairmont Avenue near 32nd St. South this Saturday may have noticed some cars sitting in the parking lot adjacent to the renovated Fire Station No. 22.

Bogue's was getting a chance to kick the tires on their new space in the building - its front door marked by an orange awning - and are continuing to do so today. They are not as of yet able to accept credit cards (read: cash only), but if you're in the mood to see what the new space is like before everyone starts to swarm on the building, you may still have some time. The most notable of the new features for the space is the patio that looks out onto 32nd St. and the site of the first ever Alabama vs. Auburn football game (it's important to note there's currently no furniture on the patio).

Workers were almost finished putting the fence up around the old location (first inhabited by the restaurant in 1946) as we left this morning, suggesting that demolition of that structure is imminent to allow for construction of a new Walgreens location seen as the centerpiece of this redevelopment project.

Who knows? Maybe we'll see some of the perks of the new Walgreens flagship store up in Chicago that opened last month when it opens this summer...
